Nurses: Angels of Mercy

As the conflict raged, women like Clara Barton and Dorothea Dix selflessly dedicated themselves to caring for the wounded and sick. In makeshift hospitals and on bloody battlefields, they risked their lives to alleviate suffering, providing solace and comfort to fallen soldiers from both sides.

Spies: Agents of Intrigue

Women's keen observation and ability to blend into society made them exceptional spies. Rose O'Neal Greenhow, the "Rebel Rose," used her social connections to gather valuable intelligence for the Confederacy. Phoebe Pember, a double agent, played both sides against each other, passing crucial information to both the Union and the South.

Soldiers: Breaking Barriers

Despite societal disapproval, some women disguised themselves as men and fought alongside soldiers on the front lines. Sally Tompkins, a physician, served as a surgeon in the Confederate army. Sarah Emma Edmonds, known as "Franklin Thompson," fought in several battles as a Union soldier.

Union Activists: Voices for Equality

Women like Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Lucretia Mott seized the opportunity to advocate for women's rights and abolitionism. They spoke out at rallies, organized petitions, and demanded equality for all citizens, regardless of gender or race.
