In his groundbreaking new book, Throwing Rocks at the Google Bus, Douglas Rushkoff exposes the hidden dangers of the tech giants and offers a roadmap for creating a more just and equitable future.

Rushkoff argues that the tech giants have become too powerful, and their unchecked growth is stifling innovation, eroding democracy, and exacerbating inequality.

He examines the ways in which the tech giants use their data to manipulate our behavior, control our access to information, and even influence our elections.

Rushkoff also shows how the tech giants' relentless pursuit of profit is driving them to create ever-more addictive products and services, which are harming our mental and physical health.

But Rushkoff is not content to merely diagnose the problem. He also offers a roadmap for creating a more just and equitable future, one in which the tech giants are held accountable and innovation is allowed to flourish.

Rushkoff calls for a new era of antitrust enforcement, one that will break up the tech giants and restore competition to the digital marketplace.

He also proposes a new social contract for the digital age, one that will protect our data, privacy, and democracy.

Throwing Rocks at the Google Bus is a must-read for anyone who cares about the future of technology and democracy.
